

Close encounters of the third kind on Inauguration Day (left)

As I was trying to gather troops and drive home before the dancing frenzy began, I run into the President as he departs the new Campus (right, not from above).

Perhaps because we both were TAs in the economics sequence of the Lisbon Law School 45 years ago, I decided to ask him about a legal minutia in his speech at the event.

The Mayor of Cascais proceeds cautiously, followed by a smiling Rector whose University, together with its School of Business and Economics, have just received a Presidential medal.

The President also smiled at the question of whether the Alfredo de Sousa Foundation was excluded from the prize and so did then Minister of Economy (a NOVASBE alumnus) though he probably did not hear the impromptu Q&A. All's well that ends well...
